Aims and Scope

The European Law Journal stands for the study of European law in its political, economic, historical, social and cultural context. The Journal aims at developing this distinctive contextual approach to both European law and to the processes of Europeanisation of national constitutional, legal, institutional and educational systems. The Journal focuses on supranational law (European Union law, the law of the European Convention of Human Rights), transnational law and the national laws of European states from a comparative perspective. It follows closely the way in which supranational Union law unfolds and the paths through which national constitutional, political and legal features shape and at the same time are shaped by European integration.

The European Law Journal is open to contributions which analyse other processes of regional integration (particularly NAFTA, Mercosur, ASEAN, Japan, China) and set them against the European case, considering the impact they have on national institutional and normative systems, economic and civic organisations, and citizens at large.

The European Law Journal has filled a major gap in the current literature on European legal and socio-political studies, and has become the journal leading the contextualization of European studies. It is essential reading for scholars, students and practitioners.

The European Law Journal is refereed and takes pride in its commitment to peer review.

Notes for Contributors

The ELJ makes of its specific focus on supranational, transnational and comparative European law a core part of its identity. The ELJ considers articles dealing with the developments in national legal orders only when the said studies have salience for the study of European law as a whole. Manuscripts concerning the relation between the European Union and other regional organisations or key regional players (China, India, Japan, Brazil) are very much welcomed.

The ELJ aims at covering all aspects of European law, ranging from theoretical analysis to highly specialized legal-dogmatic issues. In the latter case, the author should make a sustained effort to reconnect the specific legal developments with wider theoretical and policy debates, showing why and how what may look like idiosyncratic developments are relevant and resonate all across European law.

Purely descriptive pieces would only be considered when outstanding and filling a major gap in the literature.

The ELJ does not carry case notes, but is very keen on systematic analysis of the jurisprudence of supranational or national courts in a comparative perspective that contextualizes the judge-made law.

The ELJ does not carry short book reviews, but aims at publishing longer review articles which discuss one or several books and set them within the pragmatic, theoretical and policy debates on European law.

Contributions should be submitted with an abstract of 100–150 words in length. The length of the articles should usually not exceed 9,000 words including both abstract and footnotes. Articles should be submitted in English. In exceptional instances, it may be possible to arrange for translation.

The ELJ aims at reaching a decision on manuscripts within 45 days of submission, except during the university holiday periods, when the time span between submission and decision is likely to be slightly longer (Easter, Summer and Christmas recesses).

The ELJ takes pride in its fully blinded review process, which, relying on the capacity of peer reviewers to send their reviews, may result in some delays, especially when manuscripts cover highly specialized topics.
